“Whispers From The Abyss”

- My companion Professor ... Occultree (Simon) and I had an amazing adventure in Summer of '25. Let me tell you about it.
- Sir Andrew Buckinghamshire “of Oxford University” (NPC) contacted our University to investigate the mystery of the first British colony in the United States - Roanoke Island. He wanted us to find out what had happened to the missing settlers; find any descendants; establish what caused the failure of the colony; and establish whether the site is worth conducting a major investigation.
- A little bit of investigation finds that he had been involved in a Symposium of the Occult at this University the year before. Some things had occurred, and it was reported in the papers as weird things happening, but nothing definitive.
- Background information that we find out is that the climate around Roanoke Island is sub-tropical, so at this time of year it will be extremely humid. Any investigations we do should not be too strenuous for too long, or we might suffer heat-stroke.
- But the history we find out about the colony is that in Mar 25, 1581, Sir Walter Raleigh found Roanoke Island and convinced others to settle there. But it wasn't until 1586, that some ships were gathered and their leader, someone named Grenville, and the Royal Governor, Ralph Lane, led them to the island. The Indians who were there dealt with settlers in a friendly manner. But it appears that the settlers were not friendly themselves. At the end of that summer, Lane led the settlers in a pre-emptive attack against their friendly neighbors. Oddly enough, the natives weren't so friendly after that. As time passed, the settlement was not so successful without the support of the natives, so Grenville took the settlers back to England (more like fled, really). However, he did leave 15 men behind with a little boat.
- The following year, 1587, 125 new colonists came under the leadership of White. They were supposed to pick up the 15 men stranded/left behind and then they were to settle on Chesapeake Bay, but their ship left them on Roanoke Island. These new settlers only found the remains of one of the 15 men. It was assumed that the mainland natives had come & killed some & the rest of the 15 had fled to another island & vanished. Governor White returned to England for more supplies, but his return was delayed by the Spanish Armada for 3 years.
- In 1590, he returned with 2 ships but they found no one. The houses previously built had all been torn down, and palisades had been raised. In the gate of the palisade was scratched the CRO in Roman letters. There 2 theories of what happened but with no proof either way. The settlers were attacked and they fled to the south or to the north. Apparently no one asked the Indians.
- Since then, rumours of buried treasure on the island arose during Drake's & Grenville's privateer activities.
- Another story out of the ordinary is that there have been reports of ghost sightings on the island. A couple report seeing the ghost of a little girl.
- The natives of the island and area had been Powhatan Indians, but there are no known descendants of this tribe. Not unexpected, as they wouldn't have been happy with the Chesapeake settlements.
- We contacted the Indiana University about the word CRO and found that it meant “Sound/Voice With Power Behind It” in the Powhatan language.
- We traveled down by rail to Elizabeth Town with some student assistants, and we tried to find out if there was a local history club or group that could give us some of the local tales of yore. The few locals, who did know something of the past, didn't have much before Elizabeth Town was begun. So we then tried to charter a boat to the Island. A local fishing boat captain, named Mack agreed to take us there when we reached an acceptable price for him. Damn, I hate dickering.
- As we approached the island, we passed a rich yacht, which Mack told us was the Silk Scorpion, and it was owned by the Van Buren's, a couple who were big in Elizabeth Town and elsewhere.
- Our archaeological team was dropped off on the southern part of the island, and we were able to set up camp quite easily. The first days were nothing out of the ordinary, but some of us suffered from nightmares & sleepless nights. But then everybody was affected. We explored the island, including the lighthouse. We found it only 12 years old, but it had already been abandoned and the light panel was boarded up. In the north-western end of the island, we easily found the Civil War settlement, but the surprise was a shack on the eastern side, that a little risky work of breaking and entering saw us find some illegal hootch. A little further and we saw the Silk Scorpion at anchor.

- Visiting the yacht, we met Charles Van Buren and his wife, Sarah Bateman Van Buren. They had Sarah's Uncle and Aunt also on board, Matthew and Ninian Patterson. They were from Cornwall in England, you know. They all seemed quite knowledgeable on esoteric things. In the more relaxing environment, we found that this fabulously rich couple had some strange encounters themselves.
- Back at the dig site, we found a bone where the palisade of the original settlement had to have been. The bone itself didn't excite us, but the fact that it had been gnawed on by something larger than a dog concerned us. I fear that the word cannibalism was thrown most injudiciously. We had to finish this dig! There must have been something planted by the palisade by the Indians to curse this place. I know it doesn't quite seem a logical jump, but the situation suited itself to such illogical things. Working as quickly as we could, we thought we had narrowed it down to a certain area and in fact we had just found a largish piece of Indian pottery that was sealed. It looked like it was a major find! As we were discussing that maybe this was the thing that held the curse, we were attacked by animals. Animals of all sorts and all sizes came from the surrounding forests and everyone ran. I am afraid to say that we could do nothing but run by the creek into the sea, where the Silk Scorpion was now at anchor. Even so, we lost 2 of our students. As we were sailing back to Elizabeth Town, we decided to destroy this thing to destroy the curse. Although reluctant to destroy something we were trained to search for, everybody felt that it had to be done.
- I fear we didn't report things as truthfully as we used to. The students were lost in a boating accident. There was just a small incident with animals. We only found these broken shards of Indian pottery. The child bones we had found inside were interred respectfully, but without being included in our report. Roanoke Island is no longer haunted anymore, and I am proud of being involved in that but that too is not in our report. Officially, we told Sir Andrew Buckinghamshire that we were unable to find out what happened to the settlers, and that we believed that a major investigation would not raise any further light on the matter. He was also told that any strange stories were sure not to happen again.

"Regiment Of The Dead"

- Sir Andrew Buckinghamshire received a request for help from a Miss Rebecca Haughton, a resident of Framingham, a small town near Boston. What kind of help or the problem wasn't specified, but that it involved her grandfather and something about the Civil War. Even though he was told it required discretion, Sir Andrew still ask to investigate this.
- We asked the Van Buren's if they were interested, and found they were and that Matthew and Ninian had returned to England.
- Before we go, we conduct a search of the libraries for Framingham, which is cross-referenced with the Civil War. We learnt of the Framingham Vets Hospital that actually has a surviving member of the War. This Edward Haughton must have been a drummer boy in the War. There also is a quite famed Civil War Memorial for the Union Forces, which is located in Framingham cemetery on the outskirts of town. Finally, Framingham sent 50 volunteers into the 23rd Massachusetts Regiment. They were involved in the 1862 Peninsula Campaign and the 2nd Battle of Bull Run. Unfortunately, in that battle alone, 27 of the Framingham volunteers were slain in the bloody conflict, and they were buried in the town cemetery. A full list of names of the volunteers is taken down, but then we learn of 1st Lt Upton Wheedon, who was also from Framingham, led a charge that almost turned the battle around. He rallied some men and led a charge where practically everybody bar a handful died. After the battle, he was promoted to Captain. But he had been wounded and lost his leg, and so was repatriated home.
- Interesting! All the news of the time said there was only one survivor, and that was Wheedon. Dr Lucas B. Wight wrote a book Our Boys In Blue: Framingham and The Civil War, and that too only talks of Wheedon surviving, even though it has photographs of both Wheedon and Haughton. One written by Beasley Faraday, named Massachusetts and The Civil War, mentions Wheedon's charge, but it also mentions Haughton had survived and had gone on to a number of other battles.
- Contacting the Framingham Historical Society gave us the information the Memorial was funded in Feb 1866, originally by the mayor. The following year, there was a small newspaper article on the Framingham Drummer Boy, but I stress it was small. And quite surprising, just yesterday, their Civil War Memorial had been vandalized.
- Traveling to Framingham, we meet up with Charles and Sarah at the only hotel in town. We brief them and decide to go to visit the Memorial first before settling in. We find it cracked, which Sarah and Edwin say it looks like it was structurally done from within. There's some ooze coming from the cracks to support the idea. I take a sample of the ooze. While Edwin talked with the cemetery caretaker, Gerber Pender, to find out if he knows of anything. The only new piece of information he gives us is that he tells us that Upton Lamar Wheedon is still alive, but he is living as a recluse outside of town.
- While Charles and Sarah return back to the hotel, we proceed to Miss Haughton's address. From her, we find out that her grandfather was hospitalized in the Veteran's Hospital just last year, but that he has been neglected while he has been there. Edward has been more agitated since the vandalism, but he had said in the past that there was some evil out there.
- So soon afterward, we proceed to the Framingham Veteran's Hospital, and get a Nurse O'Malley to let us in to see Edward. From him, we find he is reliving a nightmare of Wheedon rallying everybody to attack a gap in the Confederates line, but just as everybody attacked, Wheedon fled. Afterwards, the night nurse tells us the same story.
- Returning to the hotel, we send the goop sample back to the university to be examined, but no response is expected anytime soon. Just for a constitutional walk, Edwin and I walk to cemetery for just a leisurely look around and then back. But where Edwin sees absolutely nothing, I see dead bodies and winged things and more all over the Monument. I admit I did lose hold of my sanity, but as I started to get a grip on myself I had to explain it to Edwin, and that set me off worse. Ushering me back to the hotel, we all have dinner and have a big discussion on what we have found and we plan to confront Wheedon, for we believe that it is he who is summoning whatever it is that is happening. Based on Charles and Sarah's experiences, it may be necessary to shoot the summoner to halt the summoning! Off-putting in the extreme, but what must be done must be done.
- But after the dinner, we learn of how they became involved in these kinds of ... adventures, really. Charles begins with a story of South Yemen, and then they had a trip on the Orient Express, followed by a visitation by a Celtic Faerie Knight. At this point, Sarah chipped in by pointing out to us that this one was completely different from the others. It was continuing on from this interruption that we learnt that it had been a pursuit of the Cup of Tristan and Ysolde. I had been coping quite well with all this until they concluded this adventure with returning it to its rightful owners ... Tristan and Ysolde! By then, I had to retire for the night, for my head was spinning.

- The following morning, Edwin goes for a constitutional to the cemetery again, but he finds the police have cordoned it off. He eventually attracts the attention of the Chief of the Detectives, a Luther Hardin, and convinces him of our relevant abilities by saying we're from Harvard and Yale. When I arrive, I go loopy again and I believe that's where I gained my phobia of bats. Edwin speaks with the caretaker again, and finds out that at midnight, Gerber had heard a sound out there. When he went out to have a look, he saw the monument glowing, and it's surface was moving and doing "stuff".
- Ushering me back to Charles and Sarah, Edwin tells them of what had happened this morning. In return, Charles tells us of the dangers of summoning. If the summoner succeeds and can control it, then it is good for the summoner and bad for everyone else. If the summoner succeeds and can't control it, then it's bad for everyone.
- We travel to the Wheedon Estates out of town, and a Roderick Aspen answers the door. We learn he has been a boarder there for 3 weeks, but he looks quite unrested. While we have tea, we learn that he has been having the exact same dreams as Edward Haughton! While he is blathering on but not making much sense, Edwin mesmerizes him and convinces him that he has "seen" us out the door and that he wants to go to sleep now.
- With the boarder asleep, we find stairs going both up and down. We were told by Aspen that Wheedon was asleep upstairs. We go downstairs and find a locked door. Charles picks the lock and we find a sleeping Wheedon. He awakens and sort of confronts us, and after we try to talk to him, we say we'll leave. In fact, we split up and investigate some more. Sarah and I check upstairs while Charles and Edwin check out the buildings out on the grounds.
- Upstairs, we find a map room. While there is a diorama of the 2nd Battle of Bull Run, I recognize the actual landscape is the same as outside of the house. There is also a wall-hanging of the same detail. Most of the rest of the upstairs is unused bedrooms, and one library. While I'm drooling over the very interesting collection, Sarah finds Wheedon's diary. It mentions his name and shows a map of a tunnel from near the house to the woods. Looking out the window, we can work out that it is to the well house.
- Outside, Charles and Edwin had checked the barn, where Edwin had almost fallen into a spiked pit trap, but then they try the well house. They go down the well and spot a secret door down at the bottom. We all gather and enter the tunnel heading back to the house, just as the map showed. As we travel, hands from within the ground below us try and grab us. We fight free and run on. Going through the door we find, we find a book in a separate basement area. Taking the book, we then find a doorway into the main basement area. We need to regather ourselves and work out what we're going to do.
- Returning back to the hotel, Edwin studies the book and finds out it is a Boden Dandee book named Corpus Modus. It is treatise on animating the dead by West African witch doctors. It also talks about raising an Effigy Of Hate. Discussing this amongst ourselves, we think that Wheedon wants to change the past ... to succeed in his charge and to lead it successfully. But this is wrong. Calling Matthew Patterson, we find out that we will need to kill the summoner and destroy the "totem" that is being used to summon the Effigy. We all know that there is little time to spare. It feels as if it is almost complete. Gathering our tools and some weapons that Charles and Sarah seem to have, we make our final return.
- Driving back to Wheedon's Estate, we enter into a fog and as we coast near to the house, we begin to see giant figures moving in the fog. As everybody squints to see, they are acting as stretcher-bearers, but they are not human. Nobody has the desire to face up to these monsters, so we flee into the house. Inside, I have a feeling that Wheedon will be up in the map room. Climbing upstairs, we find a youthful Wheedon. While Edwin and Charles try to play along with the shockingly young Wheedon until the rest of us could get in a position to jump him. But as we do, he goes berserk and starts throwing us around. Both Sarah and I are flung out the room, while the others are struggling with Wheedon. Then Sarah uses her shotgun. Unfortunately, she has failed to aim properly and I am struck down from behind. As I lay on the floor in shock, I see that eventually Wheedon is clubbed down and I think it is Edwin who shoots the map-table. Obviously this was the "totem" for then the house came alive. I think they set fire to the house, or maybe a lamp was spilled, I fear I was not in a condition to pay close attention to this. Charles and Edwin got me out, as Sarah found Aspen, and we all fled.
- As a result of this adventure, the vandalized Monument has not been vandalized again. Edward Haughton is having restful sleep once again, and is being treated better as a result. Personally, I'm having an extended leave of absence in a specialist hospital that Sarah has recommended as I heal both from the shocks and the shotgun wounds. She is very apologetic and is paying for my little holiday, but I think I don't want to be called to help for a long while.
